Not illustrated. 1866 Excerpt: ...nothing could we in conscience make, even in appearance, any concession, seeing it was but a show that our enemies sought, and for this end, that they might take advantage of it against the truth itself, and that thereby our brethren, who were in the like case, might be weakened through our example. Therefore, we thought that it was our duty to give a full testimony to the whole truth with all boldness, if the Lord would strengthen us; and to endure the utmost which man could do to us, yea, even to the sealing of it with our blood, if the Lord would call us and strengthen us 1 Melvilles Diary, p. 618. to the same; calling to mind that all the compromises which have ever been made in the cause of God have always strengthened the enemy, done injury to the truth, enfeebled the weak, and were never to this day joined with a blessing in the end.... These our resolutions being perceived by our brother, Mr James, it did greatly comfort him, he affirming that what made him so sparing, at this time, in encouraging and exhorting others to the cross was the infirmity he had seen in the whole ministry. Better it were never to resolve, than afterwards to fall back. But seeing the Lord had given us the full determination to bear whatever was required for the defence of the truth, according to the measure of grace and strength that the Lord should minister, therefore was he comforted. And so he greatly confirmed us in bearing witness to the truth, and assured us that the cross alone would give it the victory.1 The determination to which Welsh and his fellow-prisoners had come, indeed, only reflected Melvilles own sentiments--sentiments for which not long after he himself was called to suffer. It only remains to add that the conference which had extended over the w...
