

Roman Catholicism: Old and New, From the Standpoint of the Infallibility Doctrine (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Roman Catholicism: Old and New, From the Standpoint of the Infallibility Doctrine

When fifteen years ago I left the Church of Rome, it was expected that I should publish to the world my reasons for taking that important step. However just these expectations may have appeared to some, I was compelled to disappoint them, considering that controversy is not the field for a new convert, because it is apt to drive him to the opposite extreme, and to lead him to form in haste judgments which require the most mature consideration. Besides, after the mental crisis through which I had passed and which lasted for some years, I felt that my mind needed rest, and that the anxieties of a religious controversy would rather disturb me in making progress in the cause of the truth. I still think that, instead of being beneficial to myself and others, it would have been detrimental in more than one respect. My Roman Catholic friends must not think that it was fear of possible defeat that kept me from entering the arena of theological strife.
