Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: ... of the particular disease has developed. As specific therapeutics has grown, general therapeutics has declined. Read before the meeting of the Middle Atlantic District of the American Association of Hospital Social Workers, Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, Maryland, November, 1921. In the complexities of modern hospital practice, replete as it is with exact scientific problems, is not the inner man somewhat submerged? Whose duty is it to understand the human problems which surround but are apart from illness? Which specialist is the one marked out to study with a true sympathy and friendliness the troubled spirit? Every medical man realizes that the recovery of many patients can be hastened by the clearing away of mental doubts, by relieving the worry that may be daily wearing out the courage, and yet the busy doctor, especially when rushed by many patients in the dispensary, or when caring for large groups of patients in the wards of the hospital usually cannot extract from each his or her special need beyond the immediate medical problems. I wish to speak tonight on what seems to me a further development of the principles of general therapeutics as applied to institutional medicine. I want to point out again the necessity of co-operation and specialization, not in the physical betterment of patients in the narrow sense of specific therapeutics, but in the betterment of the individual as a whole in the broader sense of general therapeutics. In order to gain co-operation in any undertaking, it is necessary that it should take place around some central, clearly understood idea, toward which all must work in harmony. The central idea I wish to direct to your attention is simply this: It should be the outspoken ideal of every hospital and all connected with...
