April 8, Tuesday.--Went in the cutter, and anchored opposite the palace of Belem, where there is a grand christening; walked in front of the palace; saw the troops pass and the little Princes on a terrace--children of seven and eight--holding their hats and feathers on their heads, for the wind was high; officers and men in uniform kissed their hands, and what with giving their hands to be kissed and preserving their hats they had enough to do. Saw eight state carriages, many of them drawn by mules, which looked ill; the carriages were splendidly carved and gilded. It rained, and we took Lord Seymour's shelter in the royal stables: very fine stables, mours Diary J on the yacht close to the Taurus. We walked to the tower Dream, 1845. 0 of Belem, which guards the river; it is a fine old tower. A deal of firing cannon, rockets, etc., to celebrate the christening, vessels decorated, and all Lisbon crowding to see it. The Queen did not seem to be quite so fat as I expected; but I only saw her in a glass coach. The people did not cheer or mark approval or disapproval. CHAPTER XI. Letters to Lord Seymour from his Father--The Puseyites--Dr. Wolff--Les mœurs de quelques animaux-- Vestiges of Creation --Sir David Brewster and Babbage. This chapter contains a few short but characteristic letters, written to Lord Seymour, while on his travels, by his father, the Duke of Somerset. Wimbledon Park, November 14, 1844. My Dear Seymour, Ever since you left us we have been here. We have had the company of some literary men, Sir David Brewster, Tytler, South, and Babbage; some statesmen, Lord Glenelg, Lord Cottenham;
