

Social life in old New England

GOOD Americans are becoming more deeply interested, with each year that passes, in the intimate every-day life of those who built up this country. Though we are less and less concerned all the time about the battles fought as a means to the establishment of our United States, we care increasingly for the human nature of the men who did the fighting and for the beauty of character and countenance which distinguished the wives and daughters of those men. After telling each other for a couple of centuries that the American home is the foundation of the Republic, we are at last beginning to prove that we believe it by showing real interest in that home and in those who founded it. Thus the education that qualified for the home, the professions, and industries that maintained it, the religion that nourished it, the love that was its backbone, the hospitality exercised in it, the books that provided subjects for its conversation, the journeys that heightened its allurements, ...
