Introduction #Thugs: From Ferguson to LA 2014-2015 Photography and Interviews by Lena Nozizwe Featuring more than 70 photographs

The eyes of the world focused on Ferguson in the wake of the police shooting of Michael Brown on August 9, 2014. But in the year that followed, Los Angeles, California was also the home to a number of sanctioned demonstrations as well as acts of civil disobedience. Brown's story resonated in Southern California. Two days after he was killed two Los Angeles police officers shot and killed Ezell Ford. He was also an African-American unarmed man. Ford suffered from mental illness. In both LA and Ferguson the police who were involved said they feared for their lives. Both deaths helped reignite a national conversation about race and the use of police force. In the year that followed hundreds of local residents protested throughout LA and called for police accountability. Demonstrations sprouted everywhere from Beverly Hills to Leimert Plaza Park, from the headquarters of the Los Angeles Police Department to the Third Street Promenade in Santa Monica, from meeting rooms at UCLA to Union Station. - The protests also included die-ins, freeway blockades and even a yarn bombing at the Craft and Folk Art Museum. Veteran protesters carried signs and chanted, You say Jim Crow, We say hell no, and sang, Which side are you on? But many of the faces in the crowd were millennials learning the dialogue of protest for the first time. On November 24, 2014, a grand jury in Ferguson found that there was no probable cause to indict the police officer who killed Michael Brown. In addition, federal investigators did not find any credible evidence that police officer Darren Wilson wilfully shot Brown to death. But the Department of Justice did conclude that the Ferguson Police Department did employ racially discriminatory tactics. Following a ten-month investigation in LA the Los Angeles Police Commission unanimously ruled, on June 9, 2015, that officer Sharlton Wamplers use deadly force in the killing of Ezell Ford violated department policy. And all the commissioners found that at different times, both Wampler and police officer Antonio Villegas did not follow policy when they pulled out their guns during the confrontation. LAPD chief Charlie Beck recommended that both officers be cleared. As of the end of December 2015 there have been no reports that the police involved in the shooting have been disciplined. From the earliest days of the protests in Los Angeles I have been reporting and documenting the LA demonstrations via audio and video interviews as well as photographs. As I have read other news reports about the protests I consistently have seen the word thugs in comment sections. That is how I came to title this book #Thugs: From Ferguson to LA 2014-2015. My intent is that by seeing and reading the stories of the actual demonstrators that the narrative will move beyond the stereotypes and that the focus will be on the humanity and the diversity of the hundreds of protesters who made their feelings known and accessed their right to assemble peacefully, from Ferguson to LA 2014-2015. I also hope that word will not come at the end of much needed conversations about race, but at the beginning. www.nozizwe.com
